The present invention relates to the field of data synchronization for mobile communications devices. More particularly, the present invention relates to a method and system for synchronizing data between a plurality of mobile communications devices in a wireless data network. As the components required to build a computer system have reduced in size, new categories of computer systems have emerged. One of the new categories of computer systems is the "palmtop" computer system. A palmtop computer system is a computer that is small enough to be held in the hand of a user and can be "palm-sized." Most palmtop computer systems are used to implement various Personal Information Management (PIM) applications such as an address book, a daily organizer and electronic notepads, to name a few. Such palmtop computers have become very popular because they are small, lightweight and allow mobility. The ever-increasing popularity of palmtop computer systems has caused an explosion in the number of programs and applications available for such systems. Since palmtop computer systems are very portable, it is important to make the user interface ("UI") for such programs and applications as easy to use and as convenient as possible. Conventional palmtop computers have a time-consuming and laborious task of synchronizing a user's contacts when the user is logged in to his or her palmtop computer on different machines. Thus, there is a need to address this problem so as to reduce the time and effort involved in synchronizing a user's contacts.
